She makes fair points. In Segal's case, the manufacturer of Levoxy, King Pharmaceuticals, a subsidiary of Pfizer, announced in March that it was recalling the drug because of "complaints from pharmacists and patients of an uncharacteristic odor. The Burbank resident called CVS to complain and was told that she had to cancel her automatic refill order separately. A drug shortage isn't the fault of a drugstore. July 22, David Lazarus. The rep explained that Segal's usual med, Levoxy, couldn't be obtained, so CVS called her doctor and received permission to send her a similar drug, Synthroid, instead. Deja vu all over again. Problem was, the letter was included with the new medication, not sent in advance of the mail-order shipment. CVS' Cramer said that in response to my bringing this to the company's attention, Curcuruto will be allowed to return the drug refill for a full refund. Christine Cramer, a CVS Caremark spokeswoman, declined to comment when I asked what rights patients should have in situations like Segal's. It seems absurd to require patients to jump through such hoops themselves. All sales are final. Copyright Los Angeles Times. It's not unheard of for pharmacies to swap out one drug for another if there's a shortage. Unwanted meds Speaking of which, Adele Curcuruto, 55, told me that CVS refilled a prescription for her thyroid medicine recently even though she'd watched her doctor cancel the prescription online. Have a consumer question? If CVS' computers could receive word from Curcuruto's doctor about the canceled prescription, those computers should have no difficulty canceling all related services. Moreover, CVS' response doesn't address the potentially thousands of other customers who also may find themselves paying more for a substitute med they never requested or approved. Segal, 56, called to complain. Send your tips or feedback to david.Synthroid (Levothyroxine Sodium) drug information and medication overview.
