I would've guessed alprazolam to have more rx's than diazepam. Some criminal groups are reported to be having difficulty getting hold of what they perceive to be good quality heroin. Barnes said that a heroin shortage might appear to be a positive development, especially as it could lead to more people undergoing treatment, "but it can bring its own problems. Last edited by Aphex; at If I'm not mistaken Paderyl has a tad more mg. For me it was xanax. Also surprised at clonazepam being below lorazepam, because I know tons of people with clonazepam scripts and like, one other with a lorazepam script. There are kiterally 's of different types of diazepam out there. Valium is making a comeback, but not as the "mother's little helper" prescription pill that tranquillised British suburban housewives in the s and s. Lets just think of that 10 mg. The two sedatives act together to create a powerful but potentially lethal effect on the body. I've never heard of clonazepam being prescribed with methadone maintenance; in Finland it's primarily for epilepsy but also quite common for panic disorder. Yeah that's what I've heard and asked for in a few towns.
