See your GP immediately if you're taking lamotrigine and develop a rash. It's usually prescribed for at least six months. If it's incorrect, you may get side effects such as diarrhoea and vomiting. These can include one or more of the following: Your progress will be carefully monitored if you're taking other medication, including the contraceptive pill. However, antidepressants are commonly used alongside a mood stabiliser or antipsychotic. Most guidelines suggest depression in bipolar disorder can be treated with just a mood stabiliser. Lamotrigine If you're prescribed lamotrigine, you'll usually be started on a low dose, which will be increased gradually. If your symptoms don't improve, you may be offered lithium and valproate as well. In women, your GP may decide to use valproate if there's no alternative or if you've been assessed and it's unlikely you'll respond to other treatments, although they'll need to check you're using a reliable contraception and advise you on the risks of taking the medicine during pregnancy. Antipsychotic medicines are sometimes prescribed to treat episodes of mania or hypomania. Women who are taking the contraceptive pill should talk to their GP about taking a different method of contraception. These medicines are sometimes used to treat episodes of mania. Antipsychotic medicines Antipsychotic medicines are sometimes prescribed to treat episodes of mania or hypomania. Antipsychotic medicines can be particularly useful if symptoms are severe or behaviour is disturbed. Most people with bipolar disorder can be treated using a combination of different treatments. However, tell your doctor immediately if you have side effects while taking lithium. Rapid cycling You may be prescribed a combination of lithium and valproate if you experience rapid cycling where you quickly change from highs to lows without a "normal" period in between.
