One Doctor-Shopping Dan was even more creative. They gave steady relief throughout the day and did not require people to live their lives in every four hours increments that usually included only about one tolerable hour. Oxycontin and similar extended-release drugs were a godsend. Also, you never know when one of these guys has a gun. Of course, the people who really need these drugs which, under the circumstances, could potentially be any one of us will be forever looked at askance by pharmacists and everyone else, who view them as potential scammers, criminals and addicts who probably have guns, too. Yes, there were a fair share of addicts and scammers out there. Always a smile, always polite no matter how much of an asshole the customer was. I wonder if they switched Biff to methadone in prison. Then there were those people who called in their refills or dropped off their scripts and took a few days to pick them up. He was caught because he actually DID have a legitimate monthly script for Oxys, which he always filled at our pharmacy, which meant we had his name and address on file. Always volunteering to count the pills Which she sucked at. As Riff patiently explained to me, you can never be too careful with these people. Yes, Virginia, they do exist.
