Yet the true insanity lies in the way many medical professionals, convinced by the FDA, keep pushing the myth that "generic drugs are identical to their brand-name counterparts. To be sure, consumers benefit financially as well. Those who then went back on the brand-name medication reported that their symptoms disappeared. I wrestled with this question a few months ago when my doctor prescribed Sertraline, a Zoloft generic, to treat my depression. His scores make his case. Many insurers won't cover brand-name drugs at all if there's a generic available. This time, after a month, Sertraline hadn't made a dent in my symptoms. It discovered that "generic bupropion XL released its ingredient at a very different rate than Wellbutrin XL. The FDA, in October, confirmed that it was investigating but has yet to issue a comment or findings. But it's downright depressing when your doctor, pharmacist and health insurance provider insist that you're wrong, that there is no difference between brand-name drugs and their generics, and that these side effects you're experiencing must be in your head. When you realize those symptoms began when you switched from your brand-name antidepressant to its generic version. The FDA-approved generic, Budeprion XL, had arrived on the market last December, and in the weeks and months that followed, complaints began to appear all over Internet health boards. Users who'd been successfully treated with Wellbutrin for years said that they'd been switched to Budeprion by their doctor or pharmacist, often without being informed, and had suffered such consequences as a return of depression sometimes more severe than ever, suicidal thoughts, panic attacks, mood swings, anxiety, nausea and insomnia. Budeprion users probably found bittersweet consolation in the lab's analysis of the little yellow pills. Although both pills started out with equal amounts of active ingredient bupropion, according to the ConsumerLab report, the large upfront dose from the generic could account for the anxiety, irritability and nausea -- all known side effects of too high a dose of bupropion.
