A series of studies looking at medications for most common American conditions, including hypertension, heart disease, depression, high cholesterol, and diabetes, have shown that the older medications are at least as good as, and in fact seem to be slightly safer than their newer cousins, and at a fraction of the cost. Virtually every medicine out there is produced as an equal mixture of left- and right-handed forms, and you swallow both in equal amounts, though only the left handed form does anything. At that time, medications for conditions like high blood pressure and high cholesterol were either marginally effective, or difficult to take, and laden with side effects. The reason for this is that the first drug in a new category of medication, gets the vast bulk of the research dollars that go toward truly understanding the effect of the drug. But the pharmaceutical industry, which is extraordinarily innovative when harnessed appropriately, came up with a slew of very effective, very well tolerated, once-a-day medicines for most common conditions. Unfortunately, long experience with both the pharmaceutical industry, and basic human nature, tells us that you can hype this difference out of all proportion. These trials are usually low quality science, and are often heavily slanted to show minor i. Particularly because pharmacy costs are driving a large chunk of our wildly inflationary health care spending. So the question comes up: The whole process revolves around capturing market share for successive copycat drugs as the originals pass into the generic world. Would it be such a terrible thing to say that we can cover 90 or 95 percent of the pharmaceutical needs of America's seniors with a standard, dirt cheap and safer set of drugs, and that if you want to go outside of that, you are on your own to buy some form of market based prescription drug coverage, or pay it out of pocket yourself?
