Some of the Web sites that sell drugs insist their customers present valid prescriptions and simply make buying drugs more convenient. So we contacted Google to see if they were concerned -- both about the number of these videos and their content. Those standards prohibit users from posting unsuitable videos that YouTube says break its "common sense rules. Almost 9 percent of teenagers between 12 and 17 years old admitted to abusing prescription drugs sometime in the past year, according to a survey conducted by Columbia University's National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse. Roughly 22 percent of YouTube's viewers are 17 years old or younger, according to February demographics from comScore, Inc. And it is unlikely to be held liable for hosting any of these videos or ads, said experts like Harvard Professor John Palfrey. Multiple requests to n1pills for comment were not returned. While Internet pharmacies are nothing new, some of their promoters have begun to log onto YouTube to post videos such as these, publicizing Web sites that allow customers to purchase drugs online without a prescription. For a few moments his lips move before the video's sound kicks in. Levitt said Pharmacy Checker does find through its monitoring that a "small minority" of sites are no longer in compliance. Then, just a couple of days later, the link on the ad was changed to Cheapmeds. We emailed a link for one suspicious video to Scott Rubin, a Google spokesperson who answers questions on behalf of YouTube. One YouTube paid ad -- not a video -- directs viewers to Oxycodone. These users visit the site frequently. The pills were sent from Pratham Pharma, Shop No. Around 51 percent of its users visit the site at least weekly and another 52 percent of visitors between the ages of 18 and 34 share videos often, according to a YouTube fact sheet. A danger is that armed with nothing more than a credit card, children claiming to be at least 18 may be able to purchase drugs online without consulting their parents or visiting a doctor. YouTube does not accept ads for drugs sold online, Rubin said. Many of the search pages that display these videos contain paid advertisements.
