Physician and Duke behavioral scientist Peter Ubel, who wrote a book about how patients can work with their doctors to make medical decisions, told Business Insider that this shows a problem with medical training. States have also been cracking down on pill mills that hand out narcotic painkillers to people who don't have a medical need for them. All about being suspicious of the patients. Together, the findings suggest that some doctors are easily swayed by patients even when prescribing narcotics that are prone to abuse and that pharmaceutical advertisements targeted at patients may actually affect what doctors prescribe. To determine whether patients could influence their doctors' prescribing practices, primary care physicians from six states viewed videos in which professional actors simulated a consultation with a primary care doctor. The study also included actor-patients who requested the drug Celebrex for their osteoarthritis. The study To determine whether patients could influence their doctors' prescribing practices, primary care physicians from six states viewed videos in which professional actors simulated a consultation with a primary care doctor. Shutterstock A new study published in the April issue of the journal Medical Care highlights a troubling reality of today's health care landscape: Even when the doctors didn't prescribe oxycodone in particular, they were more likely to prescribe another strong narcotic to patients who had requested oxycodone. After viewing the video scenarios, the doctors were asked how they would manage the case and what medication they would prescribe. The wording of the patients' request for oxycodone was rather unnerving. The study found that patient requests for certain medications such as the powerful narcotic oxycodone "substantially affected physician-prescribing decisions, despite the drawbacks of the requested medications.
