Louis Post-Dispatch , stating:. Researchers are using StreetRx data to gauge the effectiveness of public policy, track changes in the market, and learn more about the people who obtain drugs this way, in the hope of helping them and deterring others. Prescription drug abuse is spreading nationwide, but it is particularly rampant in cities like Los Angeles, Miami, Chicago and New York, federal officials say. The data shows that crowdsourcing, systematic efforts to collect information from a wide audience especially online tools to mutually benefit participants and activity sponsors, serves as an effective way to evaluate drug abuse in the community, and that the black market can help predict which abuse-deterrent formulations are most successful.
