Mary Furman, a retired medical social worker in Charlotte, N. C. Blink Health recently suffered a series of setbacks when two of the largest drugstore chains, CVS and Walgreens, stopped accepting its discounts, along with a grocery chain, Publix. Having health insurance is supposed to save you money on your prescriptions. In one case, a customer whose plan was managed by CVS Caremark, the drug benefit manager, would have had to pay more for a drug through her plan at a CVS than what she ended up paying at the same store, with a coupon from GoodRx. Even as more Americans have health insurance since the Affordable Care Act was passed, insurers are increasingly asking consumers to pay a larger share of their costs. The companies are contesting the suits. Because consumers are responsible for their costs in those plans until they hit their deductible, Mr. Consumers may also pay more if they are covered by plans that require them to pay a set co-payment, no matter the cash price. In November, Blink Health sued its pharmacy benefit manager, which negotiates its prices, claiming that the company, MedImpact, had violated their agreement. If those prescriptions are filled without an insurance card, pharmacy systems may not catch dangerous drug interactions. Behind the seemingly simple act of buying a bottle of pills, a host of players drug companies, pharmacies, insurers and pharmacy benefit managers are taking a cut of the profits, even as consumers are left to fend for themselves, critics say.
