Before prescribing the new pill and tracking system, doctors should ensure that their patients are capable of and dedicated to using the system, says the FDA. The tiny sensor used in the new pill was first approved by the FDA in and has since been available for pharmacies to place inside a capsule along with other medications. Once ingested, the digital pill sends a wireless signal to the patch, which then transmits information to the app and to a companion web portal. Studies have not yet shown whether the addition of a digital tracking system will improve how well people comply with their medication regimen. The patch runs on a tiny battery, while the sensor itself about the size of a grain of sand and made of ingredients found in foods powered by fluids in the stomach. She is also hopeful that the same technology could soon be offered in other types of drugs as well. In recent years, clinical trials have used the sensor to track patient compliance with medications for conditions like high blood pressure and type 2 diabetes. The drug Abilify with or without the digital sensor can cause side effects including nausea, vomiting, constipation, anxiety, headache and uncontrollable movements.
